MISCELLANEOUS READING.

CTABLER'S HAIR TONIC .- Prepared with- "TRUTH STRANGER THAN FICTION." In the summer of 1847, an undertaker in the village of Port Republic, was sent for to bury a child, whose parents lived about three miles from the public burying ground. The road being very rough, the coffin was carried on horse back. On his way to the house of the parents of the deceased child, PLLIS' SOLUTION OF CITRATE MAG- the undertaker met with a strange negro, and, NESIA. In a very excited manner the undertaker (with the coffin before him) inquired of the lady if she had seen "Ondats," "El Gallo," "La Estrella," "El Sol," any one pass, and upon being answered in the "La Union," "Opera," "El Conde," and "La negative, he informed her that he was in pursuit of a runaway negro, and desired her to remain where she was and watch, while Corner of King and Alfred sts. be "beat the brush," at he was sure the fugi-TAMPHOR ICE FOR CHAPPED HANDS, tive would run that way. I need hardly ing a very large share of physical courage, she gave the best evidence that she considered "prudence the better part of valor," by bastening home as fast as she chould with ble capacity of undertaker and negro-catcher, failing to get assistance, and having lost sight of the runeway, burried on to the bouse of mourning. Having deposited the body of the child in the coffin, he mounted his borse and with the corpse before him, set out in a brisk trot, followed on foot by the parents, grandmether, and aunt, of the deceased; not, however, on the most direct road, to the place of burial, but by the route on which he thought it most likely the runaway might be found. The father of the child carried his gun for the purpose of assisting in the capture of the negro, should the funeral procession be so fortunate as to find him.
